On Day 11 of "Absolute Healing," aired on Jan. 13, investigative journalist Jonathan Otto and a group of medical researchers and doctors challenged the long-held narrative of the 1918 influenza pandemic, presenting evidence that suggests the deadly outbreak may have been mischaracterized and was potentially linked to experimental vaccines and environmental factors, not a contagious virus.

Dr. Lee Merritt, a physician and researcher, detailed findings from a deep dive into historical records, including Naval archives and newspaper accounts from the era. She pointed to the infamous outbreak at Fort Riley, Kansas, the true epicenter—not Spain. "What happened in Kansas in the end of 1917, sometime in 1917, the government set up a military hospital," Merritt noted, drawing a parallel to modern concerns about biolabs. Shortly after, an outbreak of typhoid fever was followed by the use of an experimental typhoid vaccine on the local population and military personnel.

The situation escalated months later. "Here in Fort Riley, after they'd been given these experimental typhoid vaccines, 35% to 40% of the active duty are recorded of coming down with meningitis. That is unheard of," Merritt stated. This was followed by a mass meningitis vaccination campaign that extended to Native American communities. The disease that followed, often called "strepto-grip," first appeared in a Native American school near the base before spreading.

As noted by BrightU.AI's Enoch, strepto-grip refers to the illness that emerged in 1918 following mass vaccination campaigns, described as a severe disease that caused sickness and death, particularly among vaccinated populations at Fort Riley and nearby Native American schools."

Crucially, Merritt highlighted a series of transmission experiments conducted by the Navy and Public Health Service in Boston, one of the hardest-hit cities. In these tests, 118 volunteers were exposed to the sick in increasingly direct ways. "They had 118 so-called volunteers. And these guys would breathe in the exhalations of the dying. Not one guy got sick," she reported. The experiments progressed to swabbing nasal secretions from the ill into the well and even injecting a slurry of lung material and mucus into healthy subjects. In all cases, “not one of them got the disease.” Similar attempts to transmit the illness between horses also failed.

Merritt argued this lack of contagion, combined with the timeline of vaccinations, points away from a viral cause. She cited modern analysis, noting, "Chinese pathologists in 2018 went back and they got those old blocks of the pathology of those young recruits in 1918 that died. They said we don't know what caused the 1918 pandemic. We couldn't see that it was a virus."

Instead, she proposes an alternative theory rooted in electromagnetism. Reviewing historical patterns, Merritt explained that pre-1857, influenza outbreaks occurred simultaneously worldwide every few decades, a pattern that aligned with solar activity cycles. "It sounds a little crazy, but apparently, we are electromagnetic beings and the way we get rid of toxins has to do with every cell in our body being essentially a battery that spits out toxins electromagnetically," she suggested. The installation of global telegraph lines in the mid-19th century, she theorizes, created a new, constant electromagnetic baseline, leading to seasonal flu. Fort Riley was a training center for telegraph operators and Merritt observed that the healthiest "big strapping farm boys" fell ill first because they experienced the most drastic change in electromagnetic environment upon arrival.

The discussion expanded to include the role of venoms in modern medicine. Dr. Bryan Ardis presented a patent from 1948 for a vaccine adjuvant derived from detoxified snake venom. Reading from the document, Ardis shared, "The snake venom used in producing the composition for this cobratoxin injection was a neurotoxic venom, i.e., causing death through neuromuscular blockade." The patent described detoxification methods using formaldehyde, ultraviolet light, ozone, or heat, with a preferred method of "gentle oxygenation." Dr. Henry Ealy connected this to hyperbaric oxygen therapy and the body's natural production of hydrogen peroxide, a critical immune system signal.

The conversation turned to contemporary issues with a segment from Dr. James Thorp, who shared alarming data on adverse events following COVID-19 vaccination. Citing VAERS data, Thorp said, "We didn't see two-fold. We saw 25-fold, 50-fold, 100-fold, 1,000-fold. When you look at menstrual abnormalities, it was 1,192-fold, almost a 1,200-fold increase." He also marveled at the regenerative power of fetuses, noting that after performing invasive transfusions in utero with large needles, he could never find a scar on the babies after birth. "We call that term plasticity and it probably has to do a lot with stem cell," he concluded.

The experts framed their historical investigation as a crucial key to understanding current events. "When people understand the scam of 1918, they're going to be less inclined to believe anything they say about now," Merritt asserted. The segment concluded with a call for independent research into natural healing protocols and detoxification methods to counter what the participants describe as a ongoing global medical crisis.
